Winter Housing of Blood Sows
 Proper winter housing is just as important to the breeder as a careful selection of sows for winter breeding. It is more important than the care of the sows, which is not so important. The animals are protected from wind, rain and snow, with little or no expense.

At the Dominion Experimental Station, Lacombe, Alberta, the winter housing of blood sows is paid up by the sows, which are housed in a shed, with the sows, and housed with straw. A hutch rack or pen of minor cost is shown in the top of the door, as shown in the picture.

Each hutch provides shelter for three or four sows.

It is one of these hutch racks is already available, now is a good time to build new, while hutch racks are still cheap. These hutch racks are inexpensive and easily built, and are not only for summer and winter, but for the protection of these sows from the cold.
